why we brunch

Brunch, as we know and love it today, was invented by a Brit named Guy Beringer, who wrote his forever Sunday altering essay "Brunch: A Plea" in 1895. Beringer suggested that as opposed to rising early on Sunday to struggle through a post-church feast, one should enjoy their beverage induced slumber and nurse away last night's decisions late into the morning. Brunch, according to Beringer, was to be "cheerful, sociable and inciting," or better put, a chance for friends to caffeinate, chow down and share their pieced together tales from hazy memories of the Saturday evening passed.

By the 1930s, Brunch had reached the North American shores, gaining popularity with Hollywood celebrities, who regularly travelled from Los Angeles and New York, looking for an enjoyable meal late in the morning, usually half way through their voyages. Popularized by hotels, Brunch quickly became a Sunday must for kitchens across the continent, where many delicious morning cocktails were thrown together, such as the Caesar and Mimosa.

Here at The Brickhouse, we do our best to keep faith with Guy Beringer's visionary mealtime, so you never have to rush out of bed and a classic menu of dishes and cocktails, with a few of our own creations mixed in. So whether you're knocking back a few BH Mimosas or diving into our ever popular Fried Chicken and Waffles, order up and we'll help you squeeze every ounce of fun out of the weekend before Monday.
